Focus: Main Idea and Inference

Reading Passage:

Every morning at Ridgeview Middle School, the same calm voice floats through the speakers. Most students only half-listen to the announcements, scrolling on their phones or finishing homework. But this year, Maya started paying closer attention. She noticed that whenever the principal mentioned an exciting new opportunity, it usually meant extra responsibilities for students, like supervising younger grades or selling tickets for events. She also realized that clubs that raised money for charity got quick, cheerful shout-outs, while clubs asking the school board tough questions were only mentioned briefly, if at all. One Friday, the announcements praised a record-breaking fundraiser but never explained where the money was going. Maya felt a twist in her stomach. She wondered: were the announcements just sharing information, or trying to guide what students cared about? That afternoon, she opened a fresh notebook and wrote at the top: What are we not being told?
